The Voice Hierarchy

Three voices live inside your head. The Critic speaks. The Analyst interprets. The Anchor commands. This course trains you to choose which one presides.

Critic (raw signal) · Analyst (interpreter) · Anchor (commander)

The Core Idea

The inner critic is not failure. It is a depth marker. The work is not silencing it. The work is forging a new voice that has the final say.

Derived from the voice-improvement notes in the Second Brain (Waitzkin's Changing Voice): the voice you feed becomes the voice that leads.

Voice 1: The Critic

Raw signal, not truth

The Critic speaks in absolutes: You can't do this. You always fail. It is fast, loud, and older than you. Its job was to protect you. It does not know it is obsolete.

Do not obey it. Do not fight it. Observe it as data. The Critic is a signal that something matters to you. Fear and ambition are the same nerve.

Voice 2: The Analyst

Signal becomes information

The Analyst translates: This is difficult because X. Here is what Y requires. It converts the Critic's alarm into a diagnosis.

When the Critic says You can't do this, the Analyst replies: This is hard because you have never done it. Step one is smaller than the fear.

Voice 3: The Anchor

Information becomes action

The Anchor commands: Hold the line. Execute step one. We adjust after. It does not debate. It does not negotiate with fear. It moves.

The Anchor is calm, specific, and forward-moving. It is the voice of competence under pressure.

The 14-Day Voice Drill

- Days 1-4: Catch the Critic. Write down its exact sentences. Do not argue. Just log them.
- Days 5-8: Translate. For every Critic sentence, write the Analyst version: This is hard because X. Step one is Y.
- Days 9-11: Command. Before each meaningful action, say the Anchor line out loud: Execute step one. We adjust after.
- Days 12-14: Full loop under pressure. When the Critic spikes, run the translation silently and act within 10 seconds.

Metric: seconds from Critic spike to Anchor action. Target: under 10 seconds by day 14.

The Personality Rule

Feed the Analyst. Let the Critic speak, never preside. The voice you feed becomes the voice that leads. This is the single highest-leverage self-talk change available.
